It was usual for the Roman ladies to disguise the real color of their hair by wearing wigs composed of the hair of the Germans. The peruke makers of Rome, according to Ovid, bought up all the spoils of German heads to grat ify those of his countrywomen, who were determined to conceal their fine black hair under a light wig. Hair from Germany was sold at Rome for its weight in gold. The Germans themselves were in the practice of using a kind of soap of goat's tallow and beech wood ashes to stain their hair of the popular color.
